

CAPTURE BANDIT IN ARKANSAS

One of Adair Bank Robbers Is Caught After Four-Day Chase

Special to The World. JAY, Feb. 15.—After spending four days in his car, and driving more than six hundred miles over eastern Oklahoma, parts of Missouri and Arkansas, Ben S. Smith, sheriff, here, returned late Monday evening and reported the capture of one of the Adair bank bandits near Sumner, Ark. The captured man gave his name as Virgil Ray, and was an Indian, previously recognized in the robbery. His whereabouts was given by a little boy near this Arkansas town, and the man was taken to Pryor and lodged in jail to await identification by the bank officials, and to have a preliminary trial. Smith was in company with Julius Smith, deputy marshal, the sheriffs of Craig and Mayes counties, and other deputized posmen. In the line chase, the officers many times were close to the fleeing bandits, who rode in fast cars. Smith saw the big Marmon car burn up on his journey, it was this car that the bandits appeared in at Adair and made their escape. Officials believe here that they are about to find out that there is a well organized system of bank robbers in this state, operating over different parts. They believe one man directs the work of the robbing and that the spoils are split in many different ways when any bank is robbed. Officers are holding themselves ready to go after other bandits at any time.

HILL ROAD MAKES SHORT CUT

$1,000 Spent in Improving Unusually Bad Highway.

Special to The World. CHELSEA, Feb. 15.—Jack Hall, living on the road between Big Cabin and this city, states that $1,000 has been appropriated by his district in the hills between these two towns with which to improve the hill road. Much work has been done on the hill roads recently. Hereafter they have been almost impassable for automobiles, and it is hoped to give the motorists a short cut between these two places. Here, before, those familiar with the hill roads have preferred to go several miles out of their way on the Ozark trail rather than go over the hill route.

CHAPTER XXIII Ted Compares Joan With Her New Friends.

At the theater, where, of course, Margaret charmed them, although she knew none of them thought it necessary, she overheard Ted ask Joan:

"Do you like this free and easy bunch who pretend to be so serious?"

"They are serious," Joan replied. "They look upon life as something to be used, not frittered away."

"Golly!" Ted gasped. Then: "Is it as bad as that, Joan? How can you stand the strain?"

"Because I believe as they do," "You don't look like them," His eyes roved over her pretty face.

"It was pretty and stylishly made even if it was old and took in her clear, well cared for skin, her dimples."

"I know," she blushed at his regard. "And do you know, Ted, I sometimes feel so gully. I feel like one of the cleverest men I know."

"You are right," that I had no right to any more than any other person, that I ought to divide it with them, the world before they take it from me."

"One of those last soap box orators who are too lazy to work and want the other fellow to support him. I'll bet a nickel! Don't you know, Joan, that the woods is full of such men and women, too, who make their living by running down the very people who support them?"

"For goodness sake, don't get mixed up with that bunch."

"Don't worry! I can take care of myself. There goes the curtain, stop talking."

"But can you?" Ted Walters said under his breath. He loved Joan Hayden and loved her with a boy's love when he first met her, had rusted in his heart, her secret face with its halo of golden curls in his mind. Now he was almost a man, almost ready to choose a mate, and he felt that he loved her with a man's honest love—that she was the one girl he wanted for his girl, then his wife.

Did she care for him? Ted Walters was no coward, yet he feared to ask her. Love seemed so far from her thoughts, comradeship the only thing she desired of him and to his comfort he thought of any man. Was she as serious minded as she would make him think, or was it pretense, a pose because of the people with whom she had surrounded herself? She was the leading spirit now just as she had been when she was a little girl and all the children did as she wanted them to, while she followed her own sweet will.

He watched her changing face as the play went on, a clean little comedy. Some of the others looked and acted bored. There was nothing particularly new, nothing at all unique about the little drama of married life being played before them. But Joan did not look bored, she followed the movement of the play breathlessly, she smiled her approval when someone who tried to do the right thing came out ahead, she wiped her eyes frankly at some sad passages. No, she wasn't like the others who saw neither the fun nor the pathos in the play, she was still clean and sweet, as dainty of mind as she was of person.

"Wasn't it lovely, Ted?" Joan asked as the curtain went down for the last time and she gave him her wrist.

"Perfectly lovely," he replied, looking straight into her eyes. He might have told her that but for the changing expressions of her face he would have known nothing of the play. He only knew it as she had interpreted it to him.

"I was so glad that dear woman was happy at last. Love seemed as if he wrapped her cloak about her slim shoulders."

Margaret sent them all home in taxis, taking Ted and Joan back with her.

"Joan is going to stay with me tonight, Ted. Would you like to come in and have a bit of supper? Hannah usually leaves something for me."

"Thank you, Mrs. Hayden. Did you ever know a college boy to refuse extra?"

With much laughter and gay chatter they raided the ice box. Margaret, wise in her generation, did not leave them, but when the impromptu meal was finished sent Ted home as was her custom when he was a lad of 12.

Tomorrow—Joan explains why she cannot live with Margaret.

Special to The World. VINITA, Feb. 15.—The preliminary trial of Charles Kessler, charged with grand larceny in connection with the theft of a Ford coupe near Centralia, has been set for February 28 and his bond fixed at $1,500.

Kessler, who is said to be connected with a bank near Nevada, Mo., is only one of four men implicated in the theft.

The original car number has been sent to the manufacturers and the number corresponding to it is on a car in the hands of a dealer in Indiana, claims County Attorney Jess Hallard, who has made an investigation of the matter. The true owner of the Ford coupe has not yet made an appearance.

American Killed in Mexico. WASHINGTON, Feb. 15.—Charles Burrow, an American otherwise known as Charles Miller, manager of a ranch near Monterey, was shot to death by two unknown individuals on February 1, while engaged in his usual duties on his ranch, Consul D. Bowman, at Monterey, today advised the state department.
